

ECB: The European Commission's Whore
All Central Banks Now Monetizing Debt

Hinde Capital Investor Presentation
May 11th, 2010

The Independence of the ECB is now in tatters.

The most important thing about money is to maintain its stability... You have to chose between trusting the natural stability of gold and the honesty and intelligence of members of the government. With due respect for these gentlemen, I advise you, as long as the capitalist system lasts, to vote for gold.

George Bernard Shaw, 1928

The ECB: The European Commission's Whore

"The purchase of government bonds poses significant stability risks and that's why I'm critical of this part of the ECB's council's decision, even in this extraordinary situation."

Axel Weber, Head of the Bundesbank

At the slightest hint of a sovereign crisis in Greece, the ECB has monetized government debt, and utterly compromised its independence:

- ❑ Trichet, 6th May 2010: “[ECB] did not discuss buying government bonds”
- ❑ Sarkozy, 9th May 2010: “. . . we have decided to give the Eurozone a veritable economic government”
- ❑ Trichet, 10th May 2010: “We are fiercely and totally independent”

All central banks, not just the ECB, have now capitulated and monetized government liabilities.

The Fed has been here before . . .

The US is running a monstrous fiscal deficit. Unmanageable deficits are often a precursor to money printing.

Monetize that Debt!

In the wake of the financial crisis, the Fed purchased an unprecedented amount of private and public debt. It has already started to monetize this. Where the Fed has led, the ECB has followed.

Gold: Skyrocketing in Euros

Now Germans and Austrians are demanding gold as the ECB has destroyed its integrity. Gold is making new highs in euros.

Currencies are an ugly parade, and one can only choose the least bad among a terrible lot. Recent events only underline the need to own gold.

Gold in Euros

Gold: Going Up In All Currencies

And it's not just in euros gold is making new highs. Gold is a good hedge against debasement in any currency when real interest rates are close to zero.

Currencies: An Extremely Poor Store of Value

Money should be: 1) a unit of account, 2) a means of transaction and 3) a store of value. The dollar has been an extremely poor store of value.

Almost all European currencies have performed worse than the dollar over the last fifty years. The ECB's recent move means the ECB is not the Bundesbank, and the Euro will be more like the Drachma or Peseta.

Betting on Deflation is a Poor Bet

Inflation is the norm. Deflation is extremely rare following the move to paper currencies. This is no surprise.

Why Gold?

Hinde Capital believes gold will go much higher over the next few years:

- ❑ All major central banks are now monetizing debt. They have shown very little independence and will do anything to fund deficits.
- ❑ Monetising debt, i.e. printing money, will debase paper currencies.
- ❑ Global demand for gold will overwhelm supply, causing gold prices to skyrocket.
- ❑ Gold produces no cash flows and therefore has no price limit.

Gold Has No Upper Price Limit

Bubbles form when goods are priced not based on any cash flows, but based on what other investors will pay (NASDAQ, subprime loans, etc).

Gold cannot be valued on any basis of cash flows and perfectly satisfies bubble conditions.

Yet the bubble is not actually in gold, rather it is in fiat money. As of now, there is no end in sight to its creation by central banks.

Thus the ultimate value of gold could be as high as the moon.

As investors allocate money to gold, demand will overwhelm supply.

Gold: Massively Lagging Money Creation

The growth in global money supply is vastly exceeding central bank gold holdings.

Without anything to restrain money issuance, central banks have behaved irresponsibly and printed money at a furious rate Gold, however, cannot be printed.

Most Central Banks Hold Little Gold

Emerging market central banks hold very little gold. Their primary holdings are in US Treasuries. The scope for gold allocation in emerging markets is huge.

Most Central Banks Now Buying Gold

For the first time in forty years, central banks are beginning to buy more gold.

India, Sri Lanka, China, Russia and others are now buyers on any weakness in the gold price.

Gold: Buy What China is Buying

China holds almost no gold, but now it is buying. Investors should buy what China is short of.
